UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

ORDER AND JUDGMENT***

Before LUCERO, GORSUCH, and McHUGH, Circuit Judges.

After Mr. Davis pleaded guilty to federal gun charges and served his prison term he was placed on supervised released. Soon after his release, though, state officials convicted him of a new crime. For its part and in response to this news, the district court opted not to revoke Mr. Davis's federal supervised release but to modify its terms. Now, among other things, the court forbade Mr. Davis from accessing the Internet. But Mr. Davis quickly violated these new terms too. And at that point the district court did decide to revoke his release and sentence Mr. Davis to a new prison term — though one followed by yet another term of supervised release that, again, included conditions forbidding him from accessing the Internet.

*After examining the briefs and appellate record, this panel has determined unanimously that oral argument would not materially assist the determination of this appeal. See Fed. R. App. P. 34(a)(2); 10th Cir. R. 34.1(G). The case is therefore ordered submitted without oral argument. This order and judgment is not binding precedent, except under the doctrines of law of the case, res judicata, and collateral estoppel. It may be cited, however, for its persuasive value consistent with Fed. R. App. P. 32.1 and 10th Cir. R. 32.1.

Before us, Mr. Davis contends, among other things, that the Internet use condition the district court imposed at his latest sentencing hearing cannot be squared with United States v. Ullmann, 788 F.3d 1260 (10th Cir. 2015). Decided after the district court issued its latest sentence in this case, Ullmann holds that supervised release conditions completely prohibiting “Internet use or use of Internet-capable devices will typically constitute greater deprivations of liberty than reasonably necessary, in violation of [18 U.S.C.] § 3583(d)(2).” Id. at 1263. To be sure, Mr. Davis didn’t raise any Ullmann-type argument before the district court so our review in this appeal can only be for plain error. And, as the government notes, it is within our discretion to deny relief under that standard where (as here) the appellant’s submissions do not address the plain error test, its various elements, or attempt to argue how they might be met: it is not this court’s duty, after all, to make arguments for a litigant that he has not made for himself. See Richison v. Ernest Grp., Inc., 634 F.3d 1123, 1131 (10th Cir. 2011). At the same time, the government candidly — and commendably — concedes that in this particular case all four elements of the plain error test are satisfied. And just as we may decline to make arguments for parties we may of course accept the well-taken arguments they do make, including their well-taken concessions of error. We do so here. The case is remanded to the district court with instructions to vacate its sentence and issue one consistent with Ullmann. All other points of appeal and motions are denied.
